

1st WASSER Science Slam in Limburg an der Lahn

As part of the annual conference of the Water Chemistry Society in Limburg an der Lahn, the 1st WASSER Science Slam will take place on Monday, May 6, 2024!

We would like to invite you to participate in this unique and entertaining format of science communication.

What is a science slam?

A science slam provides the stage for a special kind of science competition in which scientists can present their research projects in short, easy-to-understand, and entertaining talks. The aim is not to present groundbreaking scientific results of your work. Rather, it is about explaining what you are researching in an understandable, concise, and funny way. Therefore, not only the scientific content of your presentation will be assessed, but also the clarity, brevity, and entertaining nature of the talk.

Your jury is the audience, who will decide by applause who was able to attract the most interest for their topic within 10 minutes. And of course, there is no competition without a prize, fame and honor!

In addition, the 1st WASSER Science Slam is a great opportunity for you as a slammer to pass on your experience and expand your presentation skills.

If we have sparked your interest and you would like to actively participate, please register for the event today with Stephanie Spahr (stephanie.spahr@igb-berlin.de) and Marco Scheurer (marco.scheurer@lubw.bwl.de).
